

#1 Jamaree Bouyea (San Francisco) 6'2 180 lbs. PG SR. (2/20/21 vs. LMU, 2/22/21 vs. Gonzaga)

It's no exaggeration to say that nothing has been given to Bouyea over the course of his basketball journey, only earned. In his most recent trip to play at top ranked Gonzaga inside an empty Kennel in Spokane, I wondered aloud how and why Bouyea only received one D1 scholarship offer out of Palma High School in Salinas, as he dropped 16 first-half points against heralded Jalen Suggs, a consensus NBA lottery pick for 2021. My suspicions grew with every pull-up three pointer, every calculated slice through the lane, every thoughtful set-up pass to an unsuspecting teammate for an easy bucket. Bouyea, didn't play as well the second time vs. Gonzaga, but still showed intriguing flashes and kept Suggs and Ayayi on their toes.

He has high-level quickness with and without the ball in his hands. In the open court he is very difficult to slow down and stop. Analytic guys are big on "stopping speed" and "change of direction speed", well analytically Bouyea, I'm assuming would rank high. He can stop on a dime and elevate quickly or change pace and direction seamlessly. He has NBA 3pt range and doesn't need much space or time to get his shot off. He certainly shows some skills and characteristics offensively that look to translate well to the NBA. Percentage wise his overall FG% is 50 and 3pt % is 37.2. However, his FT attempts are low and his FT% is 74 with a strong assist to turnover ratio. He plays a ton a minutes and his motor never slows down.

Defensively, he is below average in PNR situations and average in defending hand-offs or off-ball action, etc. Overall, he is an average defender and rebounder at best. With his quickness though he could be a lot better, because he uses it to be an effective defender in iso or post-up situations.
